

P A I N E ' S
POLITICAL AND MORAL
M A X I M S

SELECTED FROM

THE FIFTH EDITION

OP

RIGHTS OF MAN,

PART I. AND II.

With Explanatory Notes and Elucidations; additional interesting Observations on the present State of Public Affairs; and important information for the benefit, not of the House of Commons at Westminster, but of the whole Commons of Great Britain and Ireland. And an Introductory Letter to Mr. Paine.

---

BY A
FREE-BORN ENGLISHMAN.

---

"Writers there are, who, whatever may be their object, carry on their attacks by soft rather than against.

Life of Thomas Paine, p. 93. Philadelphia;

Said in the Title to be by Francis Oldys, A. M., of whom there is no such person; and the real Author is a clerk in office at Whitehall.

---

L O N D O N:
PRINTED FOR THE BOOKSELLERS.

1792.

by 1835
MacEachlan

---

TO
MR. THOMAS PAINE.

SIR,

If I did not consider you as a man of the most liberal sentiments, guided by motives superior to those which direct the conduct of the generality of men who are ranked as public characters, I should stand in need of a powerful apology, for offering to the public an epitome and analysis of your excellent treatises on the Rights of Man, together with such remarks as I flatter myself will have a tendency to enforce, extend, and perpetuate the sound maxims of true policy and moral rectitude contained in them.

But to an author who asserts and maintains freedom of speech and action upon all occasions, when the religious and civil liberties of mankind are at stake; who avows and adopts that fundamental principle of civil society, which declares, "That individual inconvenience must give way to public good;" and who reprobates all monopolies, and discards every idea of selfishness; it will be necessary only to declare the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, so help me God! with respect to the following sheets.

Convinced that your tracts contained a body of information, the general communication of which must prove highly beneficial to the whole Commons of Great Britain, if properly understood; yet, that they likewise contained much extraneous and exceptionable matter, foreign to the main subject, and calculated rather to weaken than to strengthen the cause they were meant to serve; a lively imagination, and impetuous zeal having, in the opinion of myself, myself, and many other moderate men, equally the advocates for the Rights of Man, transported you beyond the bounds of reason and equity. It was therefore earnestly wished, and much expected that some of your numerous friends would analyze, that is, resolve your compound work into its first principles, and rejecting every thing that deviated from them, reduce the whole to precision, and regular order. It was observed, that like some preachers, you had spoiled the TEXT, by unnecessary amplifications, tedious digressions, and consequent tautologies. It was thought, that a clear statement of your incontrovertible Maxims, made easy to common understandings, and divested of all indecent reflections on characters and stations in public life, which mankind, from the earliest ages, have been taught to revere, would prove more beneficial to the mass of the people, than the whole of the two parts of your Rights of Man, which besides, are fixed at too high a price to be purchased by those, whose interests are most deeply concerned in the information they communicate.

Many months, however, have elapsed without any appearance of such a digest of your valuable work ; and this was considered as the more extraordinary, it being well known that some of your friends were likewise the friends of that great and good man the late Dr. Price, who was an honour to humanity, to his country, and to his profession ; and he was advised soon after he had published his first edition of Observations on Civil Liberty, to print for general circulation, another edition on coarse paper, at so small a price as three pence ; this precedent, as nearly as possible, should have been followed with respect to your more useful tracts.

Under this idea, a writer of established reputation, hitherto unknown to you, has undertaken the task, and has made the following analysis of the Rights of Man, a vehicle to convey to the public some observations which he wished for a fair opportunity to communicate ; and he further declares, that the last sheet was at press, before he saw the resolutionz

Solutions of the Constitutional Society, to print a cheaper edition of your treatises. It was therefore too late to retreat; the bookseller had an interest involved with that of the writer; and it depends on you, Sir, by expressing your approbation or disapprobation, to add the writer, who is intimate with many of them, to the number of your respectable friends, or to let him remain still a stranger to your person, though an avowed admirer of your distinguished talents, and universal PHILANTHROPY.

I shall close this letter in the same free style, which runs through the former part of it. I will cherish, I will circulate, I will support to the last hour of my existence, those incontrovertible principles, which I have taken from your treatises and arranged compactly, or in other other words, connected, and joined together in such a manner, that they must strike the general reader more forcibly than when disjointed, detached, and thrown at a considerable distance, in order to introduce some extraneous matter, bearing little or no relation to the grand subjects of your work. —— And I defy your adversaries to point out one single Maxim amongst those I have preserved in the following pages, which ought not to be communicated to, and clearly understood by, the free-born people of every nation upon earth.

But I have rejected, and will as much as possible discard from my remembrance, those unmanly, those indecent reflections, and that gross abuse which you disperse up and down, in a work (in other respects invaluable) on persons whose stations render it impossible for them to make use of the common remedies to heal the wounds of insulted honour. The assault is cowardly, unworthy of the cause, in which the champion of the Rights of Man stands forth, and wantonly insulting, because every argument against monarchy, its hereditary successions, and combined corruption and profusion, would have applied with equal force, and with much better grace might have been carried forward to future periods. — It would be romantic to suppose that the present possessors of those high stations should quit them immediately, at the word of command of the advocate of the Rights of Man ;—it could therefore answer no good purpose to vilify them, or to endeavour to lessen them in the eyes of the people, by empty ridicule.

vocate

In a word, my plan has been to render you and the public an essential service, by putting the Maxims which bear your name, upon the respectable footing of ROCHEFAUCULT, MONTESQUIEU, and other eminent political writers, whose great works have successfully undergone the same operation to which I have subjected your's ; regardless whether your natural genius, which appears to me to be very extraordinary, has inspired you with the same sentiments which guided the pens of all the celebrated writers on the Religious and Civil liberties of mankind ; or whether by the force of much reading, close application, and strong judgment, you have been able to borrow from the lights which shone before you, Maxims, which will now no longer rest upon your single credit, however high it may stand in the republic of letters ; but upon the corroborating testimony of those ancient and modern authors, to whom I have referred your adversaries, in one of my strictures on their conduct, for the truth of this observation.

I am, with respect for your virtues, and compassion for your infirmities,

SIR,

Your true friend,

THE FREE-BORN BRITON,

London, May 15, 1792.

P. S. A loose, unguarded style, and some inaccuracies may be traced in the following pages, not calculated to stand the test of that pedantic criticism, which George Chalmers has exercised upon your Rights of Man, under the masque of the Rev. Mr. Oldys. The candid reader will attribute such defects to the pressure of time, there being a necessity to compose, print, and publish within a very short space.

---

INTRODUCTION.

In the Rights of Man, as asserted and maintained by the sound reasoning of Mr. Paine, a lasting monument is raised to liberty ; and the eyes of the oppressed, who form by far the major part of the human species, in most of those countries, which proudly call themselves civilized nations, are so clearly opened to all the forms and shapes under which political impostors practise their public extortions and delusions, ecclesiastical and civil, that neither the mandates, nor the bribes of prime ministers, the sophistry of political casuists, the delusive powers of oratory, nor the soothing adulation of sycophantic courtiers will ever be able to close them again.

But let it not be imagined, that an enlightened people, because their rights are ascertained and made public, and the means of remedying many intolerable grievances by temperate, constitutional reforms, are pointed out, will all of a sudden become political madmen, or wild speculative theorists, ready to embrace every innovation, and to pull down a fabric erected by the wisdom of ages ; at the instigation of any one man, or any set of men whatever.

Material alterations for the better may be brought about in well-constituted governments, and such is that of Great Britain, in principle, though not in modern practice, without revolutions ; and, bad as the state of affairs was in France, it is highly probable, that if the nobility, the superior orders of the clergy the possessors of great landed property amongst the commons and all other wealthy citizens, had taken warning in time, and had attended to the bold and energetic remonstrances of the parliaments ; to the first general statement of the national income and expenditure, and of the corrupt administration of the finances published by Neckar; and to the steady refusal of the parliaments to register acts of taxation, under the then impoverished state of the lower classes of the people—or if, finally, they could have discarded that narrow, selfish maxim which is the disgrace of the present race of little Great Men, in more countries than one—that of fitting quiet under the worst circumstances of a nation, and consoling themselves with this dastardly reflection, “It will last our time!” how many Archbishops, Dukes, Earls, Counts, Bishops, and Abbots, who thought their rich possessions fully secured during their short lives; but are now convinced by sad experience—“that it could not last even their time,”—

—“Might still have borne their blushing honours
“Thick upon them.”

Conscious, that under the old government they were the oppressors, by exclusive privileges, immunities, monopolies, unmerited pensions, sinecures, and other indirect means of wringing from the hard hand of the needy peasant and labourer the best fruits of their industry; and of eluding their proportionate shares of the burthens of the state; they ought to have foreseen that a wretched system of partial oppressive taxation could not proceed beyond certain limits; and that it was arrived at its ne plus ultra in France some years prior to the late Revolution.

Then it was that the affluent nobility and clergy, and all other opulent subjects in the kingdom, should have taken the salutary advice given in print by the commissioners appointed by the British parliament to examine, take, and state the public accounts of the nation. In their eleventh Report, dated Dec. 4, 1783*, of which the following is a transcript.

“Where the resources of a country (Great Britain) are so

* Published by Stockdale 1784, and declared by Lord Mansfield to be a most clear and distinct statement of the present situation of this Country, with regard to its public revenue, and the real state of its finances.

so extensive, so various and productive, a spirit of frugality universally diffused and kept alive cannot but be attended with the most powerful effects. The subjects of this kingdom are opulent, generous, and public spirited: let the distresses of their country be fairly laid before them; and let that interest they and their posterity have in this constitution be appealed to, and they will contribute cheerfully and liberally to her relief. The subject should have no doubt, but his contributions for the public service, find their way undiminished, without deviation or delay, to their proper objects. The evil does not admit of procrastination, polliatives, or expedients: it presses on, and must be met with force and firmness. Let public benevolence take the lead of private interest; example may produce much, and must begin somewhere. An extraordinary and unprecedented conjuncture in the finances of a country may require extraordinary and unprecedented efforts. Every man may dedicate a portion of his income, or some share of his affluence, according to his faculties, to this great national object: let the produce of such a general exertion be wisely directed and faithfully applied; and the national debt, enormous as it is, will begin to melt away; and every man, who contributes to so great a work, will feel the consolation resulting from the discharge of the most important of his duties, by having assisted in relieving public distress, restoring public credit, and averting a national calamity."

Here, was a noble admonition, equally suited to the then actual circumstances of France and England; but what reception did it meet with? It was disregarded by both, though in some degree attended to in the former kingdom, when it was too late to prevent a revolution. At home, the NESTOR of the age, the venerable MANSFIELD, in his speech in the House of Lords, February 4, 1784, declared, that it contained matter highly interesting to every individual of the community possessed of landed or funded property. Another ancient sage of the law, and a brother peer, was so forcibly struck with this observation, that after a careful examination of the report, (if we mistake not), he summoned the House, in order to make a motion relative to it: supposed to be of the nature of that measure which was too tardily taken in France: when the nobility, beginning with the Duke of Orleans and other opulent persons, contributed a fourth part of their annual incomes to the immediate relief of their distressed country. Whether the immaculate Pitt did not approve of the plan, or what other impediment came in the way, we dare not declare—the power of the House of Peers to punish severely the publication of unwelcome truths may perhaps be hereafter abolished *. But it can be no libel to notice here, what is known throughout the kingdom; that proscription, pollution, and opulence, have been the ways and means perfidiously pursued in, now, nearly nine years, by the wonderful minister! and a deceitful system of diminishing the national debt, is substituted in the room of a benevolent contribution from the opulent inhabitants of the country. We have a Duke of Bedford, but no Duke of Orleans, &c.

Is it not then high time to learn lessons of wisdom, from whatever quarter they are communicated, whether from an American secretary to Congress, or a French National General, from Tom Paine, or the Marquis de la Fayette. We need not follow them, or any other man into the labyrinths of republicanism—we may pull the roses, without pricking our fingers with the thorns.

The Bill, if we may use the expression, when metaphors of every kind are the fashion—the Bill of the British constitution is an excellent bill; sound and true in its principles, but in passing through the national Committees which new times and circumstances have established and rendered essentially necessary, its most enthusiastic admirers must allow that it may receive some material amendments for the benefit of the community at large. The chief merit of Mr. Paine's

* The Court Calendar for 1784 or 1785, will shew who was made one of the Lords of the Admiralty at that juncture, and is now a Lord of the Treasury, sub silentio Patria.

Paine's pamphlets consist in pointing them out, and reasoning clearly upon the equity, expediency, and sound policy of adopting them; nor has he done more, in many instances, than support the opinions of men of the first eminence amongst us, in and out of parliament, delivered in their speeches, or in their writings upon various occasions; but never, as we remember, urged so home, or enforced so strongly, in bold, manly, free, and unqualified terms.

But what will the despicable tools of ministerial power say to the following assertion, founded in strict truth. The best political writers, the highest in esteem, throughout Europe, who have long been held in veneration, have handed down to the present generation all the general, all the liberal maxims, concerning religion, law, and civil government, to be found in Paine. Whether he ever read those authors or not, we cannot ascertain; but certain it is, that their essence is collected and applied to the present state of our executive government, which will by no means stand the test of the best political institutes: the constitution will; but the present mode of administering that constitution must shrink from the comparison. And this is the reason, that foolish Mr. Rose of the Treasury trembles on the bench, and the crafty clerk in Lord Hawkesbury's office carries on his base attacks against Paine by fp, fights him under the mask of a Philadelphia person, fit disguise for the most impudent falsehoods that ever were published; and stabs him in the dark. But, of this upstart clerk at the Cecil, more hereafter.

Before we proceed to a regular digest of Mr. Paine's Maxims, we will take the liberty to remind his cowardly antagonists, that in all ages there have appeared men of extraordinary abilities, who, without the advantages of finished university-education, have surpassed, even in literary eminence and public utility, the best scholars of their time. Professional men report, that there are many more profound lawyers and better scholars in this kingdom than the Lord Chancellor, but they will not pretend to produce duce a man of such strong natural parts, and extensively useful talents. Such a Bear is worth the keeping at London, at Rome, or in any country upon earth; and had he been chained to an oar at the galleys, and fed upon bread and water a few years before his promotion, by feeling distress himself, he would have learned humanity, and not have steeled his heart against the cry of the poor prisoner for debt; he would have reflected, like a benevolent statesman, on the causes which have filled our jails; he would have remembered that the necessities, real or supposed, of the nation under ministerial management, have increased the burdens of tradesmen, manufacturers, and artificers to such a degree, that the tax-gatherers are scarcely ever from their doors.

Surely, after a painful servitude of seven years, every young man has a right to establish himself as a master in his art or trade; but if he fails in this, from the undermining arts of some great monopolizer with an immense capital, or through rack-rent, the necessity of fallacious appearances, the extravagant price of good provisions, and the weight of taxes most rigorously levied,—“Let him rot in prison, there shall be no release, no insolvent-act; neither the mercy of the Jewish, nor of the Christian law shall be followed.” A general liberation every seven years was the policy of our forefathers: Set the prisoner free, redeem the captive, says the Scripture; and so said GEORGE THE SECOND, and his Chancellor LORD HARDWICKE.

Give to Thurlow the milk of humanity, and he will be the first of men—as it is the benevolent Tom Paine, with equally strong natural parts, has the advantage; for he has removed the prejudices which kept two powerful nations, almost perpetually at variance, and has contributed to diminish the number of prisoners of war, instead of setting his face against every proposition for restoring the father to his children, the husband to his wife, and the industrious subject to the state.

In

In Britain it is safer to be a thief than a debtor; want of evidence, the talents of an able counsellor, or the pathetic oratory of an eloquent one, may set the thief at liberty in a few hours; but in this once happy land of freedom, the debtor is left without remedy, to pine away the remainder of a wretched life at the mercy of a hardened creditor*.

In fine, there cannot be a greater proof of the necessity of displaying and circulating such declarations of the religious

* The confinement of vast numbers of useful hands in prisons for debt, is one of the most inhuman, unmanly, and impolitic steps that ever disgraced a people asserting a spirit of liberty. An absolute power is given to one individual over the person of another in England—the land of freedom—if he sinks under the weight of this arbitrary power, if he dies, no inquisition is made for his blood—The king was not his creditor, yet he quietly acquiesces in the loss of a subject, who might, if he had been released, have contributed to agriculture, population, manufactures, trade, navigation, or the defence of the state. All civil governments founded for the happiness of mankind lay it down as a maxim—that the interest, convenience, and often even the ease of individuals, must be sacrificed to the public good: Admit this principle, and then tell me with what justice can the British government allow the locking up so many useful members of society yearly for debt.

I take up this subject in a political and commercial light; but as I am sensible many will object that credit would be at a stand, and the course of trade impeded, if debtors were not punishable for failures; I must beg leave to observe, that there are various modes and degrees of punishment, which should always be proportioned in affairs of property to the injury done to individuals; but society should have a power of reclaiming its share of the person of every one of its members; no punishment, therefore, to be inflicted by any individual for an injury not made a capital crime by law, should extend to depriving the state for ever of the utility of a subject.—Mortimer's Elements of Commerce, Politics, and Finance, 4to, last edit. 1783.

gious and civil rights of man, than the conduct of those men in power, and their agents, who, in the elegant language of Mr. Sheridan, both in and out of parliament, loudly exclaim, " That the present is an improper time to bring forward any proposition for reforms in the constitution, or the redress of any grievances." For every succeeding ministry will undoubtedly say the same, in order to protect and shelter themselves under this fallacious system ; that the constitution itself is endangered by any attempt to make the most salutary alterations or amendments ; whereas, the perfection of that very constitution consists in its principle of admitting continued reforms. It is but a bad compliment to the British constitution to assert, that it is dangerous to meddle with it, or to propose reforms, such assertions appeared to him grossly fallacious ; the British constitution is not so brittle or decayed, as to be endangered by a touch or an examination. On such an authority then, which exceeds that of George Chalmers, as much as the soaring eagle in his towering flight excels the stupid flutter of the lathern-winged bat ; let us concisely state those maxims, political and moral, which are calculated to promote the general welfare and happiness of mankind.

PAINES

---

PAINÉ'S

POLITICAL AND MORAL.

MAXIMS.

---

1. THE rights of man must be traced up to the creation of man; for if we take the definition of them from any record of antiquity short of that, we must be deceived by the contradictory statements of them under different forms of government, at different and distant eras: But as they subsisted prior to the formation of all civil governments, we must recur to the time when man came from the hand of his Maker. What was he then? MAN: That was his high and only title, and higher cannot be given him. The Mosaic account of the creation is full to this point, the unity or equality of man. The expressions admit of no controversy—"And God said, let us make man in our own image. In the image of God created he him; male and female created he them." The distinction of sexes is pointed out, but no other distinction is even implied. So far PAINÉ—and all the systems of civil government recommended by those eminent political writers and philosophers, Cicero, Aristotle, Plato, Seneca,

Harrington,

Harrington, Sidney, Locke, De Wit, Bolingbroke, Voltaire, Rousseau, Mirabeau, David Williams, and many others proceed upon this principle, to ingraft the civil on the natural rights of man given to him originally by his Creator. As to the high-sounding titles of Emperors, Kings, Dukes, &c. &c. &c. which came into play long after, they are thus lightly estimated by Alexander Pope :

A wit's a feather, and a chief's a rod ;
An honest man's the noblest work of God !

Yet the runners and clerks in office to ministers in Pope's days were not employed to vilify and abuse him in Billingsgate language in any daily print they can hire, and in the shops of such piratic book-sellers as Vamp the Second in Piccadilly, which has been the case with respect to Tom Paine.

2. The genealogy of Christ is traced to Adam ; Why then not trace the rights of man to the creation of man ? I will answer the question ; because there have been up-start governments thrusting themselves between, and presumptuously working to unmake man.

3. If any generation of men ever possessed the right of dictating the mode by which the world should be governed for ever, it was the first generation that existed. Every generation is equal in rights to the generations which preceded it, by the same rule that every individual is born equal in rights with his cotemporary.

Consequently, all men are born equal, and with equal natural rights, in the same manner as if succeeding races of men had been continued by creation instead of generation, the latter being only the mode by which the former is carried forward ; therefore every child born into the world must be considered as deriving its existence from God. The world is as new to him as it was to the first man that existed, and his natural right in it of the same-kind.

4. The civil rights of man originate from his natural rights. Man does not enter into society to become worse than than he was before, nor to have fewer rights than he had before; but to have those rights better secured.

Natural rights are those which appertain to man in virtue of his existence—of this kind are all the intellectual rights, or the rights of the mind; and also all those rights of acting as an individual for his own comfort and happiness, which are not injurious to the natural rights of others.—Civil rights are those which belong to man, in right of his being a member of society. Every civil right has for its foundation some natural right pre-existing in the individual, but to the peaceable enjoyment of which his individual power is not in all cases sufficiently competent. Of this kind are all those which relate to security and protection.—He therefore deposits his natural rights in the common stock of society, and takes the arm of society, of which he is a part, in preference and in addition to his own. Society grants him nothing. Every man is a proprietor in society, and draws on the capital as a matter of right:

5. Civil power; properly considered as such, is made up of the aggregate of that class of the natural rights of man, which becomes defective in the individual, in point of power; and answers not his purpose; but when collected to a focus becomes competent to the purpose of every one.

6. The several sources from which civil societies or governments have arisen, and on which they have been operated, may be all comprehended under three heads: First, Superstition. Secondly, Power. Thirdly, the common Interests of society, and the Common Rights of Man.—The first was a government of priestcraft. The second, of conquerors; and the third, of reason.

When a set of artful men pretended, through the medium of oracles, to hold intercourse with the Deity, as familiarly as they now march up the backstairs in some European courts, the world was completely under the government of superstition.

After this a race of conquerors arose, whose government, like that of William the Conqueror, was founded in power, and the sword assumed the name of a sceptre. Governments thus established last as long as the power to support them lasts; but that they might avail themselves of every engine in their favour, they united fraud to force, and set up an idol which they called Divine Right, and which, in imitation of the Pope, with effects to be divine and awful, and in contradiction to the founder of the Christian religion, twisted itself afterwards into an idol of another shape called Church and State. The key of St. Peter, and the key of the treasury became quartered on ~~one~~ another, and the wondering, cheated multitude worshipped the invention.

7. All the religions known in the world are founded, so far as they relate to man, on the equality of men, as being all of one degree. Whether in heaven or in hell, or in whatever state man be supposed to exist hereafter, the good and the bad are the only distinctions. Nay, even the laws of government are obliged to slide into this principle, by making degrees to consist in crimes, and not in persons. In other words, constituting degrees in crimes without distinction. So likewise in religion....

Thou shalt do no murder, is a general commandment; it does not except Emperors, nor those vile princes calling themselves Christians and Protestants, who sell their subjects to be slaughtered, and under the specious denomination of war, commit murder by wholesale: nor yet those infamous ministers, and corrupt representatives of the commons, who hire by subsidiary treaties, companies and regiments of their fellow creatures, either to be murdered, or to commit murder.

8. The natural and religious unity of man is a truth of the greatest importance, and of the highest advantage to society. By considering man in this light, and by instructing him so to consider himself, it places him in a close connection with all his duties, whether to his Creator, or to the creation of which he is a part; and it is only when he forgets his origin, or to use a more fashionable phrase, his birth and family, that he becomes dissolute. It is not among the least of the evils of the present existing governments in all parts of Europe, that man, considered as man, is thrown back to a vast distance from his Master, and the artificial chain filled by a succession of barriers, at a series of turnpike gates through which he has to pass.

the

9. " The duty of man is not a wilderness of turnpike gates, through which he is to pass by tickets from one to the other;" and to pay a toll at each to Kings, Prince Ministers, Nobility, Archbishops, Bishops, and other lordly priests. No, " his duty is plain and simple, and consists but of two points. His duty to God, which every man must feel; and with respect to his neighbour, to do ~~what~~ what would be done by." And on these two points hang all the law and the prophets. But corrupt administrations of government cannot be supported by adhering to them. If those to whom power is delegated do well, they will be respected, if not, they will be despised.

The next subject of discussion at large, in the order of our analysis of Mr. Paine's pamphlet, should be the civil rights of man under any given form of government that has already existed and been established many centuries; or under any new system of policy that has arisen in our day, or may hereafter arise, as the direct effect of the improved understanding of mankind, or as the result of successful revolt from intolerable ministerial oppression. But before we enter this extensive field of investigation with an intention to cull its natural flowers, and to root out its noxious weeds; it seems necessary to make some enquiries concerning the nature and origin of power, by which the civil rights of man are secured, and made as permanent as the condition of mortals will admit.

Upon close examination we do not find that Mr. Paine has advanced a single syllable on these points, which is not either derived from, or supported by much earlier, and better authorities than Henry Dundas, William Pitt, Charles Jenkinson, senior, alias Lord Hawkesbury, or any of their associates, male or female.

OF POWER.

THE freedom of individuals, secured by the wisdom and integrity of the body politic, was the first object of all wise and honest legislators; and they differed only in the mode of attaining it. Hence are derived the different forms of government that have prevailed in the world.

To the rights of natural liberty there ever belonged a reciprocal obligation, not to molest others in the enjoyment of the same rights; but the force of separate interests, and of the passions prompted men, in their primitive state, to a violation of this reciprocal tie.

The proud, the lustful, the savage, and the robust, disturbed the tranquillity of the meek, the temperate, and the virtuous, on whose natural rights they made the most shameful encroachments, either by fraud or violence: as, therefore, man through necessity had associated with his own species to defend him from other animals, so now it became as necessary to secure him from the assaults of his fellows; which could not be effected by any other way, but by surrendering, in a great measure, his natural liberty into the hands of one or more persons, who, by the common consent of all the members of the association to which he belonged, should be invested with the authority to govern the rest; and armed with power to enforce that authority. Thus men submitted to be governed; and the restraints laid on natural liberty, by the institutes of government, gave it, as it were, a new creation, and a new name; for it thenceforth became CIVIL LIBERTY.

Can any thing more be wanting, to prove that all power originates with the people, and that it may, nay, that it ought to be modified, improved, or upon just grounds, resumed by those from whom it sprung. Where then is the honesty, the justice, or the wisdom of the clamour raised against the late Dr. Price, Priestley, or Paine, for reminding the people that they possess this inherent right. And it is not only absurd, but base in the extreme, to deny that the natives of Great Britain possess that right, which we have seen claimed and exercised by the inhabitants of other countries, associated for that purpose. The United States of Holland asserted and maintained it, when they shook off the Spanish yoke, with the aid of England, in the happy age of English virtue.

the

America, France and Poland, have in our day asserted the same grand principle, to be the foundation of all good government; yet in London, the seat of the British government, vile miscreants countenanced by people in power, fill our daily papers with gross abuse, and impudent falsehoods, to vilify characters far superior to their own, and in one breath, to traduce American, French, Dutch, Polish, and British patriotism.

Dr. Price only committed one error, that of ascribing to a defective revolution the acquirement of three fundamental rights, which are derived from a purer source—from Almighty wisdom and equity in the original creation of the mental as of the corporeal powers of man.

From God himself he derives the following rights, enlarged upon by the celebrated dissenting divine, in his famous sermon, preached on the 4th of November 1789.

1. The people of England, or the people of any other country upon earth, have a right collectively to choose their own governors.
2. To cashier them, that is, to suspend, to remove, or discard them for misconduct—for misrule, in themselves, or by deputies.
3. To frame a government for themselves—for all power abused to an extreme, which defeats the end for which it was established, reverts to the source from whence it was derived; and resides in the Majesty, or Sovereignty of the people, to be exercised in a new election of governors. MORTIMER, a veteran political and commercial writer of some repute at home and abroad*, whom we

* The great and little biographers, Priests, Lawyers, Justices, Women and Children, who have tortured and twisted into

we have before had occasion to mention ; long before the French Revolution, long before Paine emerged from a private station to be the mainspring in the new fabric of American freedom.—In the year 1772, published the famous principles traced up to the highest written authorities upon the origin of governments in his Elements of Politics, page 243, where he says, “ The advantages of this change (from natural to civil liberty) are too evident to be called in question. It is true, civil liberty differs from natural, in that it divests individuals of the free disposal of their persons and actions, and lodges it in the hands of their rulers ; but they are thereby secured from the lawless rapine and violence of malevolent individuals ; and they acquire three very considerable rights by civil liberty :

1. “ That of insisting, that these Rulers or Sovereigns shall make a good use of their authority ; particularly by insuring to them that protection in consideration of which they resigned their natural liberty.

2. “ That of demanding or exacting from their rulers solemn into every shape and form under heaven, each look, word and gesture, of their demi-god Dr. Johnson, to their no small embarrasment ; have either omitted, or were ignorant of the following anecdote, which can be verified, if occasion should require it, on oath. A Foreigner of distinguished rank, and a man of letters, asked Johnson in a company of literati, if he knew such a living author as Mortimer.—The Doctor, who had a happy facility at not knowing persons whom he deemed infinitely inferior to himself—replied—No Sir, there is no such man amongst us—You must be mistaken, Sir, nobody knows him.—A few days after this, a gentleman of some eminence in the republic of letters, and upon a sufficient footing of intimacy with the learned Doctor to look into his library, occasionally found therein one of the eleven editions of Mortimer’s treatise on the funds, entitled, Every man his own Broker, with numerous passages marked by Johnson, which shewed that he had perused it with studious attention.

solemn promises, covenants and oaths, for the due performance of their respective duties.

3. "The right of claiming the aid and support of all good men, of their own, and other societies, to enable them to compel their governors to protect them in their civil rights and immunities, or, on failure thereof, to remove them, and elect others more worthy to govern."

No fulminating, unmasked Jesuit, inheriting all the scurrility of Cicero, without his genuine love of his country: no pitiful clerk in office, now crawling on his belly, and licking the dust, in the view of raising his head aloft hereafter, and being rewarded with the coronet and robe for doing the dirty work of ministers, part of which is to spread false alarms of intended revolutions, and levelling principles, without the least shadow of reason, in order to furnish a pretext for abusing men much honester and more worthy of promotion in the state, than themselves—dared to controvert these principles, avowedly forming part of a plan for finishing the education of young gentlemen having prospects of being called into public life.— Yet this author's work passed through two editions during the administration of Lord North, an unpopular minister, whose true character will not be understood till some years after his Royal Master, Earl Mansfield, General Howe, and himself shall be gathered to their forefathers. The intrigues of courts cannot be penetrated, much less delineated impartially, while the principal actors on the political stage are in being—strange discoveries are brought to light, in after times, by the joint aid of curiosity, industry, and due influence to get access to, and possession of mouldering papers—witness Sir John Dalrymple's Memoranda, Thurlow's State Papers, and many others of a similar complexion.

But alas, poor Paine! future historians must say of thee! he flourished in the reign of Pitt the Second, the greatest political impostor of the age in which he lived*; who with

* If the Life of the Author of this pamphlet is spared till the commencement of the next session of parliament, he hereby pledges himself to prove it beyond a doubt. But the inwith matchless effrontery and with a long-legged, hop, step and jump up the back stairs, leaped into the first office in the kingdom, snatched up the keys of the Treasury, turned alchymist, took into partnership the jaded hackney-horse of Lord North's administration, and became editor sousmain of more than two thirds of our daily and evening newspapers—destroying that beautiful uniformity of printing, which the laziness of modern printers had long established, in order to introduce in large capitals of the national debt paid off to this day, by Mr. Pitt's wise and economical administration of the finances—without adding floating in the market; renewed year after year, during the above hull-a-by exhibition, on the same plan, as that of a private man, who borrows money on his note of hand at twelve months after date, and when it becomes due, defires his creditor to take a new note for another year—and another—and another still! Alas, poor Paine! thou art to be persecuted, if not prosecuted by this hasty, pudding administration made up of shred, and patches—of odds and ends—barely for repeating the political maxims of the earliest and latest uncorrupted writers on government, legislation, and the civil and religious rights of man!

NINE MILLIONS

FIVE MILLIONS OF EXCHEQUER BILLS

In further proof of this; before we dismiss the article of power—let us adduce in evidence; the declaration of rights of the French National Assembly; the constitution of the United States of America; and the new constitution of Poland.

FRANCE. The representatives of the people of France; formed into a National Assembly, considering that ignorance, forgetfulness, or contempt of the rights of man, are the sole causes of public grievances, and of the corruption of government, have resolved to exhibit, in a solemn declaration, vestigation of political and financial operations must necessarily be slow, especially while documents of office are withheld, even from respectable members of the British parliament.

sation, the natural, unalienable, and sacred rights of man ; in order that this declaration, ever present to all the members of the social body, may incessantly remind them of their rights, and of their duties ; to the end that the acts of the legislative power, and those of the executive power, being every moment compared with the object of all political institutions, may acquire the more respect ; in order also, that the remonstrances of the citizens founded henceforward on simple and incontestible principles, may ever tend to maintain the constitution, and to promote the general good.

For this reason, the National Assembly recognizes and declares, in the presence, and under the auspices of the Supreme Being, the following rights of man, and of a citizen.

1. All men are born, and remain, free and equal in rights : social distinctions cannot be founded but on common utility.

2. The end of all political associations is the preservation, of the natural and imprescriptible rights of men : these rights are liberty, property, security, and resistance against oppression.

3. The principle of sovereignty resides essentially in the nation : no body of men, no individual can exercise an authority that does not emanate expressly from that source, &c. &c. &c.

POLAND. Stanislaus Augustus, by the grace of God, and the will of the nation, King of Poland, &c. &c. &c. together with the Confederate States assembled in double number to represent the Polish nation.

In the name of God one in the holy TRINITY ! Persuaded that our common fate depends entirely upon the establishing and rendering perfect a national constitution ; and convinced by a long train of experience of many defects in our government—— we do solemnly establish the present constitution, which we declare wholly inviolable in every part, till such period as shall be prescribed by law ; when the nation, if it should think fit, and deem it necessary, may alter by its supreme will, such articles therein as shall be found inadequate.

DEFINITION OF PUBLIC POWERS.

ARTICLE V. All power in civil society should be derived from the will of the people, its end and object being the preservation and integrity of the state, the civil liberty, and the good order of society, on an equal scale, and on a lasting foundation. Three distinct powers shall compose the government of the Polish nation, according to the present constitution, viz.

1. The legislative power in the states assembled.
2. Executive power in the King and the Council of Inspection.
3. Judicial power in jurisdictions existing or to be established.

AMERICA. The first establishment of the American new government, demonstrated their firm belief, that all power in every civil society, as well at its commencement, as at any future period of its existence, ought to flow from the people—not from any number, or body of the individuals, whether distinguished by the titles of Associations, friendly Societies, or Clubs, but from the collective community, or main body of the natives.

On this principle, each of the thirteen States of America has an internal government for the management of its domestic affairs: but, for the conducting such matters of general concern, as equally relate to all the several parts, each of the States sends deputies to meet in Congress, who, when met are called, THE UNITED STATES IN CONGRESS ASSEMBLED.

AMERICAN CONSTITUTION.

ARTICLE I. All the legislative powers herein granted shall be vested in a Congress of the United States, which shall consist of a Senate, and a house of Representatives.

Sect. 2. The house of Representatives shall be composed of members chosen every second year, by the people of the several States, and the Electors in each State, shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State Legislature.

Sect. 3. The Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State, chosen by the legislature thereof, for six years.

No person shall be a senator, who shall not have attained to the age of thirty years, and been nine years a citizen of the United States, and who shall not when elected, be an inhabitant of that State for which he shall be chosen.

No person shall be a Representative who shall not have attained to the age of twenty-five years, and been seven years a citizen of the United States, and who shall not, when elected, be an inhabitant of that State, in which he shall be chosen.

ARTICLE II. The executive power shall be vested in a President of the United States of America. He shall hold his office during the term of four years; and together with the Vice-President, be chosen for the same term, by electors from each State.

We need not proceed any farther in our inquiries into the genuine unperverted source of power and rational distribution of its parts. We shall therefore close this head with one fair question, put to the wretched tools of administration, and supporters of the hereditary rights of princes, passive obedience, and other slavish doctrines.

Where do you Edmund Burke, George Chalmers, and others of the same stamp, find that levelling principle in any of the constitutions here laid before you, with which you charge Paine, the Constitutional and all other societies in England, who aim at, and do every thing in their power to restore the administration of our excellent constitution to its first principles? Does not every page of Paine's pamphlet support the pre-eminence of the American constitution, to the foundation of which he so largely contributed? Is there not a regular gradation of well-divided power, and little difference between that constitution, and the British in its original purity—except a variation in empty titles. Presidents and Vice-Presidents, instead of Kings and Vice-Rois—Senators, instead of Peers—together with such an amelioration of the representatives of the people, as ought to put you and all your adherents to the blush?

power,

For shame then, ye hirelings of an audacious Premier, desist from scribbling those unmanly, those dastardly paragraphs which appear daily in the World, the Harold, and other newspapers; and bestow the numerous petty funs of five shillings for each ministerially ordered abuse and falsehood, on some charitable institution in your respective neighbourhoods.

Finally, on the subject of order, with respect to the gradation of power, Paine justly observes, “ that the French constitution puts the Legislative before the Executive. The Law before the King, la Loi, le Roi. This also is in the natural order of things; because laws must have existence before they can have execution.” And with much more reason ought it to be thus in a limited monarchy, where the King acknowledges himself to be the first subject of the laws by his coronation oath.

OF GOVERNMENT.

BEFORE we enter upon an examination of the merits, or demerits of governments, it may be necessary to request our readers vigilantly to guard against that confusion of ideas which the adversaries of true civil liberty endeavour to introduce whenever they are investigated, in order to terrify the people with groundless fears of an intended subversion of our excellent constitution. But sensible and dispassionate men will not be thus misled; they will digest Paine’s political aphorisms, rejecting with us, every thing indecent, every thing extravagant, and inapplicable to that constitution; but at the same time, if there are but two grains of wheat hid in a bushel of chaff, they will consider it as a patriotic duty to extract them, to sow them in the fertile fertile soil of Britain, and devoutly to pray, that in due time, they may produce an abundant harvest of national virtue—in other words—of voluntary reformation.

1st. "As the present generation of the people of England did not make the government, they are not accountable for any of its defects; but that sooner or later it must come to their hands to undergo a constitutional reformation, is as certain as that the same thing has happened in France." In this prediction we must heartily concur, remembering always, that in this passage, Paine has given the true title to the great change so lately made in the former government of France; all the writers and speakers upon this subject in their own National Assembly, in our parliament, and elsewhere, are mistaken in calling it a Revolution: and we defy them to prove that it goes beyond a bold, but noble reformation. Nor can any reason be assigned why the Reformation, so far as it went, which was established by granting the crown to William and Mary, was not characterized by its proper denomination, except either to distinguish it from the Reformation under Henry VIII. which already formed an epoch in our national history under that title—or to shew, which is of more importance, that the right of election to the crown had revolted to the people, assembled in their national capacity, according to the true principles of the constitution, in Congress, or in Convention.

The government under James II. was a limited monarchy; the crown claimed and exercised undefined prerogatives, and extended them so far, as not only to become oppressive, but intolerable, and the rights of the people being at that time either not clearly ascertained or wilfully misunderstood: a redress of grievances became absolutely necessary: the weak and bigotted monarch, instead of compliance, fled from a conflict, conducted with due decorum, and opened the door to a noble Reformation, accomplished with that prudence and moderation which will ever attend national, not party reformations in this kingdom. But the constitution remained unchanged, the administration ministration of that constitution alone, underwent a considerable reform. The monarchy was more securely limited; the rights of the people better assured; and national felicity established on a firmer basis—but unfortunately, these great objects once attained, there resulted from the mode of attaining them, a system of finances, capable of such a latitude of operation, as might in the end, bring back a state of degeneracy and corruption in the administration of the government, requiring fresh information. Whether this has been the effect produced by an enormous national debt or not, must be left to the decision of more candid reasoners than Burke or Chalmers.

The constitution consists of three estates, King, Lords, and Commons, independent of each other; if this independence then is by any political intrigues so far changed, that one of the three has a controlling power over the other two—the constitution is not in fact subverted, but the administration of it is become so corrupt, as to call loudly for speedy, effectual reformation, and for exemplary punishment to be inflicted on the mal-administrators.

Having no desire to be intimately acquainted with the Attorney-General, we shall not venture to give our opinion respecting the influence of the ministerial power of the crown at present, on the proceedings of either house of parliament.

But we beg leave to put the following question to the immaculate Pitt and his modest associate, or rather his Master, Henry Dundas.

Does the following article of the court-creed form a part of our excellent constitution in Church and State.

The King's business (that is the court phrase for the business of the nation) cannot be carried on unless the cabinet, the ministry, or the first minister, which all mean the same thing, is sure of a decided majority, however obtained, in both houses of parliament? No reply can be expected—instead therefore of expecting it from such interested parties, let us state the opinion of a sensible foreigner published lished at London, in the year 1717, when prosecutions for *Liber*s did not set up Bystides in England.

Minutes of the Negotiations of Monsieur Mesnager at the Court of England, towards the close of the last reign (of Queen Anne) done out of French. London 1717, 8vo. Printed for S. Baker. "But I must do Mr. Harley * the justice, that if he was not so resolved at first in the measures taken— that is to say, for the dissolving of the parliament; yet he left no stone unturned in the managing the elections after he was come into it; and that he did then so effectually, and with so much judgment and success, that even the Earl of Godolphin lost all his elections in that which was called his own county. There was not a town where his interest was strong, but he saw himself supplanted; and an interest formed to oppose and overthrow him; the like success was seen in other parts; and in a word, it appeared that he (Mr. Harley) had laid his measures so true, and was served so punctually, that at the summing up of the numbers, the Whigs saw themselves distanced and outnumbered in a surprising manner as to the deputies of their lower parliament. As to the upper parliament, or upper house as they term it, he had his eye so intent upon that also, was so vigilant in taking his advantages, and dextrous in improving them, that he carried his point there also; as I shall note in its proper place.

" It is significant to observe, how little these people differ from us in France, in the effect of an absolute monarchy, after all the boasts they make of their liberty; the subordination of their kings to the sovereignty of the laws; the ancient rights of the people, which they call their birth right, &c. &c. seeing that by the power of court artifice, the influence of their money, and the management of subtle statesmen, the people are always made tools to operate in their own bondage; and to enthrall themselves either either to this, or that party, or prince, as effectually as if the said prince had them under his absolute direction—nay in this also, the English prince has the advantage; that this is done so by the agency of the ministers—that any tyranny is always charged upon them, and the prince is not blamed; and if ever the power of the law gets an interval to exert itself, it is the minister who bears the resentment, not the sovereign—of whom no more is desired but to change hands, and all things are quiet in a moment.

* Then in the same situation as the present minister Mr. Pitt, and having just taken the bold measure which served as an example to him—that of dissolving a parliament.

“ It is true it has been otherwise, as in the example of King James II. but the reason of all that difference lay in the impolitic measures of the prince, who espoused his ministers to his own ruin, and took the whole upon himself; but wise princes in England have no more to do, but to let their ministers subject the constitution to the absolute will of the Sovereign, by the insensible degrees above-mentioned, and the English are as easily made slaves as any other nations: nay, they will make themselves slaves, for they will sell and betray their own liberties and rights for money; as they effectually do, who sell their votes in the choice of deputies to parliament; and it is most certain, that such is the blindness and unconcernedness of the people of that obstinate nation, and so far are they from having any notion of the circumstances of their constitution, that whatever ministry comes in play, and will wisely dispose such sums of money as are necessary for the work, they shall not want a parliament to their mind; who may give up to them all those valuable rights that a nation can possess, who have the best constitution in the world.”

Here, the sensible Frenchman speaks the language of a free-born Englishman; but the state of political freedom is changed since his time, in the two countries. In France at present, a man may speak and write his sentiments on public grievances which cry aloud for redress; in England, the only question is, whether he shall be condemned by the judges or the jury for speaking or writing the truth, supposing

supposing that truth reflects on the conduct of a double placed minister.

We are told day after day, that this is not the proper season to attempt reforms. But if the same language could have prevailed, when it ought to have carried the day, the duration of parliaments extended from three to seven years, which was a greater innovation upon the best constitution in the world, than any that is now proposed by the Constitutional Society; the Society of Friends of the People, or any other body of free-born Englishmen, who are now making ineffectual attempts to curtail ministerial, which is in fact, despotic power in Britain; had not taken place.

As there have been no peers created through the influence of the immaculate PITT, from any other motive but that of rewarding distinguished merit, and descendants from races of illustrious ancestors, whose eminent services to the nation merited such honours to be conferred on their posterity—we must congratulate our contemporaries, on the restoration of the original purity of that branch of our constitution called the House of Lords, which in the days of Monsieur Mesnager, he scandalizes in the following words :

“ It is true, that at the same time a like reserve about Spain and the West-Indies*, was offered by the Whigs in the House of Lords, where the court lost it by one vote; but they valued not that, it being in their power to secure the votes of that part of the parliament, by creating and giving votes to as many as they pleased; which was done by the advice of the Treasurer (Harley) to the number of twelve at a time. It gave me frequent occasions to reflect upon the English nation, when I saw how they flattered themselves with notions of great privileges which they enjoyed, and of their being more than other nations, secure of their liberties, which to me seemed a mere chimera;

E

seeing

* In negotiating the Treaty and subsequent Peace of Utrecht.

seeing I found that court managements were come to such a degree of perfection in England, that all the liberties they so much boasted to enjoy, were often entirely at the mercy of their princes; and that whoever reigned—and whatsoever party had the ascendant with the Sovereign, they never need want a parliament to do their business, whether the design might be to preserve those liberties, or to destroy them—two ways I found they have, in that quarrelling and divided nation, to do this, viz. by money in the lower House, or House of deputies*, and prerogative in the higher House; by the first, if the court was willing to spare enough of it, to bribe and influence elections, they have obtained such members to be chosen, as were of their own party, and who getting in by corruption, would no doubt act by corrupt principles; and by the other, it was in their power as a prerogative, to make not twelve voices only, but twelve-score at a time, and as often as they found cause, all which considered, it appeared to me, that it is owing to fate, and the good dispositions of their princes, more than the stability of their constitution, that they are not long since fallen into a worse condition of bondage, than what they think ours to be in France."

The deplorable state of degeneracy into which our parliaments were reduced at the time the above minute was taken by Monsieur Mesnager, Paine reasons upon as if the parliaments of our day were subject to the same corrupt influence; and we suppose it to be on this ground that Charles Fox, the celebrated Man of the People, has declared his writings to be a libel; probably he may think it in character to justify the integrity of the representatives of the British Commons collectively, without any retrospect individually to the mode of getting in for ministerial boroughs boroughs. Now let us hear Paine speak for himself ; and suppose him for a moment attached to the wonderful Mr. PITTE, at the time when that gentleman proposed, and warmly contended for a parliamentary reform.

* The numerous taxes levied since, to pay the annual interest of an enormous debt, not existing at that time, money was obliged to supply the want of lucrative places in the gift of ministers.

11. " The right of reform is in the nation in its original character, and the constitutional method would be by a general convention elected for that purpose."

12. " There is a paradox in the idea of vitiated bodies reforming themselves."—If in the parliament which empowered itself and future parliaments to sit seven instead of three years, a new parliament every two years had been proposed, is it not absurd to imagine that a majority would have consented to abridge the term of their existing privileges !

" The constitution of France says, that every man who pays a tax of sixty sous per annum (two shillings and six-pence English), is an elector. Can any thing be more limited, and at the same time more capricious, than the qualifications of electors in England ? Limited, because not one man in a hundred is admitted to vote ; Capricious, because the lowest character that can be supposed to exist, and who has not so much as the visible means of an honest livelihood, is an elector in some places ; while in other places, the man who pays very large taxes, and has a known fair character, and the farmer who rents to the amount of three or four hundred pounds a-year, with a property on that farm to three or four times that amount, is not admitted to be an elector.

" The French constitution says, that the number of representatives for any place, shall be in a ratio to the number of taxable inhabitants or electors.—The county of Yorkshire, which contains near a million of souls, sends two county members to parliament ; and so does the county of Rutland, which contains not an hundredth part of that number. The town of Old Sarum (Salisbury) which contains not three houses, sends two members ; and the town of Manchester, which contains upwards of sixty thousand souls * , is not admitted to send any. Is there any principle in these things? Is there any thing by which you can trace the marks of freedom, or discover those of wisdom?"

The French constitution says there shall be no game-laws; that the farmer on whose land wild game shall be found (for it is by the produce of his land they are fed), shall have a right to what he can take—that there shall be no monopolies of any kind—that all trade shall be free, and every man free to follow any occupation by which he can procure a livelihood, and in any place, town, or city throughout the nation."

" In England, game is made the exclusive property of those great men who are not at the expence of feeding it; and with respect to monopolies, the country is cut up into monopolies. Is this freedom?—In these chartered monopolies, a man coming from another part of the country is hunted from the chartered cities and towns as if he were a foreign enemy. An Englishman is not free of his own country; every one of those places presents a barrier in his way, and tells him he is not a freeman—that he has no right" there. Within these monopolies are other monopolies. In a city, such for instance as Bath, which contains between twenty and thirty thousand inhabitants, the right of electing representatives in parliament is monopolized by about thirty-one persons.

" The French constitution says, that to preserve the national representation from being corrupt, no member of the National Assembly shall be an officer of the government, a placeman, or a pensioner." How is it in England? Aik Henry Dundas, Treasurer of the Navy and Secretary of State.

The American constitution decrees, that no man shall be a representative of any place, who is not an inhabitant of of the place he represents at the time of his election, nor till he has attained the age of twenty-five years. In England, a tyrant, who while he was governor of an Indian dependency on this country, monopolized rice till he produced a dreadful famine, which strewed the streets of the chief city of his government with the putrid carcases of the starved inhabitants; or a general, who never shewed any generalship but at gaming, can buy a borough, paying a certain sum to the person or persons who have the audacity to call it their borough; and far from being an inhabitant, without being personally known, except at the time of election, by any of the electors. As to age it is no consideration, the first boy minister's first House of Commons was chiefly made up of what my aunt Tabitha used to call Hobbydyhoys, between men and boys—of the second we dare not say any thing—~~count~~ against Mr. Attorney-General, friend Ridgway and I do not like the cut of his robe. But surely every sober impartial man must be of Lord Lansdowne's third party, who contend for, nay, who will not be denied a sober moderate reform.

* And the most flourishing and extensive manufactures, which, as branches of foreign commerce, require great attention, and constitute a natural interest in every session of parliament.

Let us put but this simple question, If the Commons of Britain had been properly represented upon the principles either of the French or the American, or even the Polish Constitution, would the supplies have been voted for carrying on the American war? Certainly not; and the happy consequence would have been the saving upwards of one hundred millions of debt; and such a measure would have raised a monument of eternal gratitude to such an English national assembly—not a transitory adulatory newspaper-trophy, such as Mr. Pitt daily takes care to raise for the most delusive system of finances that ever was held forth through the medium of misrepresentation to a people, who of all others are the most credulous upon a subject of the first importance to them and their posterity.

To the newspaper puffers of Mr. Pitt's financial abilities, I shall only apply Mons. Mesnager's observation.

“ These

" These writers in England are the best people of the kind that are any where to be found ; for they have so many terms to impose upon the people, that nothing I have met with was ever like it ; and the people of England, of all the people I have met with, are the fondest of such writings. My writer had an excellent talent, and words enough ; and was as well qualified to prove non-entities to contain substance, and substance to be entirely spirituous, as any one I have met with. I was no judge of his style, having but little of the tongue ; but as I kept him entirely secret, I found the people eager to read what he wrote ; and frequently his pamphlets, letters, or paragraphs were said to be written by one great lord, or one eminent author or other ; and this made them be more called for than ordinary at the publisher's and the writer gained by the sale, besides what I allowed him, which was not inconsiderable.

I shall add one more quotation from the same author, and then proceed with my digest of Paine's Maxims till I come to a conclusion. The late fictitious news from India, so well received, so extensively circulated, and operating so strongly and instantaneously on India stock, induced me to refer to, and extract the following passage.—

" As the Whigs industriously improved the time, it was in a moment spread over the whole kingdom, that the New Ministry were carrying on a private negociaction with France. There wanted not people also who daily spread the report with such confidence, as if they had been privy to every step that had been taken, though that they had any scent of the thing itself as it stood, I never saw cause to believe. But certainly there is not a nation in the world like England, for imposing on the people with false rumours, nor a people easier to be imposed upon, even by things which have not the least probability, and indeed by some that are scarce rational."—No man has experienced the truth of this observation in a greater latitude than Mr. Pitt, who, through the channel of about twelve daily and evening papers devoted to his service, has made the people believe just what they pleased.

13. " It is equally injurious to good principles to permit them to linger, as to push them on too fast. That which others may think accomplishable in fourteen or fifteen years, I may believe practicable in a much shorter period."

14. " Mankind, as it appears to me, are always ripe enough to comprehend their true interest, provided it be presented clearly to their understanding, and that in a manner not to create suspicion by any thing like self-design, nor offend by assuming too much."

15. " It would be an act of despotism, or what in England is called arbitrary power, to make a law to prohibit investigating the principles good or bad, on which such a law or any other is founded."—But we may try the force of a proclamation, or of newspaper paragraphs compiled and paid for by our clerks. And as a proof that we are in full possession of a majority of printers as well as members; when an honest man will no longer act with us, but openly and nobly exposes the absurdity and arrogance of our financial operations, we can order them to abuse and vilify him in every form of words the language will supply, and to display those stains in his private character, which we not only knew whilst he was our friend and brother counsellor, but which we contended and cherished to a blamable degree *.

16. " Mankind are not now to be told that they shall not think, or they shall not read; and publications that go no farther than to investigate principles of government, to invite men to reason and to reflect, and to shew the errors and excellence of different systems, have a right to appear. If they do not excite attention, they are not worthy the trouble of a prosecution, and if they do, the prosecution will will amount to nothing, since it cannot amount to a prohibition of reading. This would be a sentence on the public, instead of the author, and would also be the most effectual mode of making or hastening revolutions."

* See the abusive paragraphs against Lord Thurlow in the Herald, the Times, the World, and other Daily Papers; and in the WHITEHALL-EVENING POST.

17. "The defects of every government and constitution, both as to principle and form must, on a parity of reasoning, be as open to discussion as the defects of a law; and it is a duty which every man owes to society to point them out. When those defects, and the means of remedying them are generally seen by a nation, that nation will reform its government, or its constitution in the one case, as it repeals or reforms bad laws in the other.—The operations of government are restricted to the making and administering of laws; but it is to a nation that the right of forming or reforming, of generating or regenerating constitutions and governments belongs; and consequently those subjects as subjects of investigation, are always before a country as a matter of right, and cannot, without invading the general rights of that country be made subject to that prosecution."

18. "If systems of government can be introduced, less expensive, and more productive of general happiness, than those which have existed, all attempts to oppose their progress will in the end be fruitless. Reason like time, will make its own way, and prejudice will fall in a combat with interest."

19. "Government founded on a moral theory, on a system of universal peace, on the indefeasible, hereditary Rights of Man, is now revolving from West to East, by a stronger impulse than the government of the sword formerly revolved from East to West. It interests not particular individuals, but nations, in its progress, and promises a new Era to the human race."

20. "Excess and inequality of taxation, however disguised, in the means, never fail to appear in their effects. As a great mass of the community are thrown thereby into poverty and discontent, they are constantly on the brink of commotion, and deprived, as they unfortunately are of the means of true information *, are easily hated to outrage."

of

21. "But, the danger to which the success of reforms is the most exposed, is that of attempting them before the principles on which they proceed, and the advantages to result from them, are sufficiently seen and understood. Almost every thing appertaining to the circumstances of a nation, has been absorbed and confounded under the general and mysterious word government,"—he might have said administration, the most mysterious word in the English language. Though it avoids taking to its account the errors it commits, and the mischiefs it occasions, it fails not to arrogate to itself whatever has the appearance of prosperity. It robs industry of its honours, by pedantically making itself the cause of its effects ; and purloins from the general character of man, the merits that appertain to him as a social being."

Can we possibly suppose that if governments had not an interest in pursuing wrong principles, the world could have been in the wretched and quarrelsome condition we have seen it ? what inducement has the farmer, while following his plough, to lay aside his peaceful labours and go to war with the farmer of another country ? Or what inducement has the manufacturer ? What is dominion to them, or to any class of men in a nation ? Does it add an acre to any man's estate, or raise its value ?

Are not conquest and defeat each of the same price, and taxes the never-failing consequence ?—Though this reasoning may be good to a nation, it is not so to any existing

F administration.

* To the eternal disgrace of Mr. PITT, the most imperious and insolent minister this country has known since the time of Cardinal Wolsey, it stands on record, that he refused this information to a member of the British parliament ; to enable him to complete his History of the Revenue of the British empire. See Sir John Sinclair's introduction to Part III. of that useful work.

administration. War is the Pharo-table of ministers, and nations the dupes of the game.

22. "Government ought to be as much open to improvement as any thing which appertains to man, instead of which it has been monopolized from age to age, by the most ignorant and vicious of the human race. Need we any other proof of this wretched management, than the excess of debts and taxes with which every nation groans, and the quarrels into which they have precipitated the world ?

23. "Government is not of itself a very chargeable institution. The whole expence of the federal government of America, extending over a country nearly ten times as large as England, is but five hundred thousand dollars, or one hundred and thirty-five thousand pounds."

24. "It is inhuman to talk of a million Sterling a-year, paid out of the public taxes of any country, for the support of any individual, whilst thousands, who are forced to contribute thereto, are pining with want, and struggling with misery. Government does not consist in a contrast between prisons and palaces, between pomp and poverty; it is not instituted to rob the needy of his mite, and increase the wretchedness of the wretched."

25. When in countries which are called civilized, we see age going to the workhouse, and youth to the gallows, something must be wrong in the system of government. It would seem by the exterior appearance of such countries, that all was happiness; but there lies hidden from the eye of common observation a mass of wretchedness that has scarcely any other chance than to expire in poverty or infamy. Its entrance into life is marked with the presage of its fate; and until this is remedied it is vain to punish.

26. Civil government does not consist in executions; but in making such provision for the instruction of youth, and the support of age, as to exclude, as much as possible, profligacy from the one, and despair from the other. Instead of this, the resources of a country are lavished upon courts, upon ministers, upon hirelings, impostors, the hereditary successors of royal bastards and prostitutes—and even even the poor themselves, with all their wants upon them, are compelled to support the fraud that oppresses them.

And why is this? because the modern mode of administrating our constitution has undoubtedly been the most productive machine of taxation that ever was invented. The taxes in France, under the new constitution, are not quite thirteen shillings a-head: the taxes in England under the administration of the present immaculate rigidly virtuous PITT the Second, are two pounds eight shillings, including men, women, and children; amounting to nearly seventeen millions a-year.

And once more why is this? Because our excellent administration are so completely taken up with foreign affairs, with watching and vilifying opposite parties, in framing and justifying unnecessary and impolitic proclamations and securing majorities; that domestic concerns are totally neglected.

A sober citizen * paying in London, the seat of government, upwards of three pounds per head to administration (for the protection of himself and family) is knocked down, plundered, bruised, and dangerously wounded by russians in a public street at ten o'clock at night, and he has no remedy, but a reference to a pitiful ill-conducted police-office, in Bow-street—whilst “a candle holder, or a lord in waiting, a lord of the bed-chamber, a groom of the stole, and many other insignificant court lacquies enjoy thousands a-year paid out of the public taxes—the minister of the finances will not offer a reward of one hundred pounds for the apprehension and conviction of the street-robber and assassin—yet this was frequently done in atrocious cases, during the reign of George II. but it is almost treason to talk of the transactions of that era—We have now—oh happy country! a Scotch Secretary of State, who detests the mention and memory of the good old King!

But we are deluded by our perpetual adulation of the wonderful minister, who in fact all this while has been the young cub, held in a string by his leader Dundas, who for some time was kept in the back ground, but now stands foremost in the portraiture of the present blessed administration. For shame, let us hear no more of our boasted prosperous state from Burke, Chalmers, or any other aristocratical enthusiast, or hireling, until the picture bears a stronger resemblance to Paine's features of a happy nation—touched up by another master. “ When it shall be said in any country in the world—my poor are happy; neither ignorance nor distress is to be found amongst them; my jails are empty; no prisoners are lingering out years of miserable slavery for debt at the mercy of hardened individuals—my streets are free from beggars, assassins, and thieves made so by want, brought upon them by oppressive taxes—and the exorbitant price of provisions—the aged are not in want—my taxes are moderate and equal—my priesthood are humble, modest, unassuming, watchful over the interests of christianity, and above all solicitous to prevent religious quarrels by their personal example and their writings—my magistrates do not harbour and keep in pay a set of villains of worse principles and characters than those whom they transport or bring to the gallows—when hundreds of bar-doors drinking poisonous spirituous liquors privately—and hundreds of public houses more than are necessary, which bring thousands of my people to untimely graves, are not licensed in order to increase the revenue, by an immoderate consumption of excised liquors—then may that country boast of a super-excellent minister, and a disinterested administration.

some

* Mr. Walker hosier, in Oxford-Street, and many others.

CONCLUSION.

“ No question has arisen within the records of history that pressed with importance equal to the present. It is not whether this or that party shall be in or out: or Whig or Tory, or high or low shall prevail; but whether man shall inherit his rights, and universal civilization take place. Whether the fruits of his labours shall be enjoyed by himself, or consumed by the profligacy of ministers and and their adherents ? Whether robbery shall be banished from courts, and wretchedness from nations ?

28. It is always the interest of a far greater number of the people in a nation to have things right, than to let them remain wrong ; and when public matters are open to debate, and the public judgment free, it will not decide wrong, unless it decides hastily.

29. A little matter will move a party, but it must be something great that moves a nation."

30. I do not believe that the people of England have been fairly and candidly treated. — They have been imposed upon by parties, and by men assuming the character of leaders. It is time that the nation should rise above such trifles. It is time to dismiss that inattention which has so long been the encouraging cause of stretching taxation to excess. It is time to dismiss all those songs and slogans which are calculated to enslave, and operate to suffocate reflection. On all such subjects men have but to think, and they will neither act wrong nor be misled. To say that any people are not fit for freedom, is to make poverty their choice, and to say that they had rather be loaded with taxes than not. If such a case could be proved, it would equally prove, that those who govern are not fit to govern them, for they are part of the same national mass.

ON RELIGION.

If our author had never written a single line more than the following fine definition of, and observations upon religion ; this alone would have entitled him to the praise of good men ; and to a place in the temple of worthies !

" Every religion is good that teaches man to be good ; and I know of none that teaches him to be bad. But all partialities and prejudices for, or against different modes and forms of religion aside—common justice will determine, whether there ought to be an income of twenty or thirty pounds pounds a year, to one priest at the altar of the living God ! and of ten thousand pounds to another !

“ I have, however, carefully avoided enlarging upon the subject, because I am inclined to believe, that what is called the present ministry, wish to see contentions about religion, and disputing and wrangling about CHURCH and MEETING kept up, to prevent the nation turning its attention to subjects of government. It is, as if they were to say, look that way, or any way, but this.”

“ But as religion is very improperly made a political machine, and the reality of it is thereby destroyed, I will conclude this work with stating in what light religion appears to me.

“ If we suppose a large family of children, who, on any particular day, or particular circumstance, made it a custom to present to their parents some token of their affection and gratitude, each of them would make a different offering, and most probably in a different manner. Some would pay their congratulations in verse or prose; by some little devices, as their genius dictated, or according to what they thought would please; and perhaps the least of all, not able to do any of those things, would ramble into the garden or the field, and gather what it thought the prettiest flower it could find, though, perhaps, it might be but a simple weed. The parent would be more gratified by such variety, than if the whole of them had acted on a concerted plan, and each had made exactly the same offering. This would have the cold appearance of contrivance, or the harsh one of controul. But of all unwelcome things, nothing could more afflict the parents than to know that the whole of them had afterwards gotten together by the ears, boys and girls, fighting, scratching, reviling and abusing each other, about which was the best or the worst present.

“ Why may we not suppose, that the great Father of all is pleased with variety of devotion; and that the greatest offence we can commit, is that by which we seek to torment and render each other miserable. For my own part, part, I am fully satisfied that what I am now doing, with an endeavour to conciliate mankind, to render their condition happier, to unite nations that have been hitherto enemies, to extirpate the horrid practice of war; and to break the chains of slavery and oppression, is acceptable in his sight; and being the best service I can perform, I do it cheerfully."

F I N I S.

( 11 )

1820. 1821. 1822. 1823. 1824. 1825. 1826. 1827. 1828. 1829.

1830. 1831. 1832. 1833. 1834. 1835. 1836. 1837. 1838. 1839.

1840. 1841. 1842. 1843. 1844. 1845. 1846. 1847. 1848. 1849.

1850. 1851. 1852. 1853. 1854. 1855. 1856. 1857. 1858. 1859.

1860. 1861. 1862. 1863. 1864. 1865. 1866. 1867. 1868. 1869.

1870. 1871. 1872. 1873. 1874. 1875. 1876. 1877. 1878. 1879.

1880. 1881. 1882. 1883. 1884. 1885. 1886. 1887. 1888. 1889.

1890. 1891. 1892. 1893. 1894. 1895. 1896. 1897. 1898. 1899.

1900. 1901. 1902. 1903. 1904. 1905. 1906. 1907. 1908. 1909.

1910. 1911. 1912. 1913. 1914. 1915. 1916. 1917. 1918. 1919.

1920. 1921. 1922. 1923. 1924. 1925. 1926. 1927. 1928. 1929.

1930. 1931. 1932. 1933. 1934. 1935. 1936. 1937. 1938. 1939.

1940. 1941. 1942. 1943. 1944. 1945. 1946. 1947. 1948. 1949.

1950. 1951. 1952. 1953. 1954. 1955. 1956. 1957. 1958. 1959.

1960. 1961. 1962. 1963. 1964. 1965. 1966. 1967. 1968. 1969.

1970. 1971. 1972. 1973. 1974. 1975. 1976. 1977. 1978. 1979.

1980. 1981. 1982. 1983. 1984. 1985. 1986. 1987. 1988. 1989.

1990. 1991. 1992. 1993. 1994. 1995. 1996. 1997. 1998. 1999.

2000. 2001. 2002. 2003. 2004. 2005. 2006. 2007. 2008. 2009.

2010. 2011. 2012. 2013. 2014. 2015. 2016. 2017. 2018. 2019.

2020. 2021. 2022. 2023. 2024. 2025. 2026. 2027. 2028. 2029.

2030. 2031. 2032. 2033. 2034. 2035. 2036. 2037. 2038. 2039.

2040. 2041. 2042. 2043. 2044. 2045. 2046. 2047. 2048. 2049.

2050. 2051. 2052. 2053. 2054. 2055. 2056. 2057. 2058. 2059.

2060. 2061. 2062. 2063. 2064. 2065. 2066. 2067. 2068. 2069.

2070. 2071. 2072. 2073. 2074. 2075. 2076. 2077. 2078. 2079.

2080. 2081. 2082. 2083. 2084. 2085. 2086. 2087. 2088. 2089.

2090. 2091. 2092. 2093. 2094. 2095. 2096. 2097. 2098. 2099.

2100. 2101. 2102. 2103. 2104. 2105. 2106. 2107. 2108. 2109.

2110. 2111. 2112. 2113. 2114. 2115. 2116. 2117. 2118. 2119.

2120. 2121. 2122. 2123. 2124. 2125. 2126. 2127. 2128. 2129.

2130. 2131. 2132. 2133. 2134. 2135. 2136. 2137. 2138. 2139.

2140. 2141. 2142. 2143. 2144. 2145. 2146. 2147. 2148. 2149.

2150. 2151. 2152. 2153. 2154. 2155. 2156. 2157. 2158. 2159.

2160. 2161. 2162. 2163. 2164. 2165. 2166. 2167. 2168. 2169.

2170. 2171. 2172. 2173. 2174. 2175. 2176. 2177. 2178. 2179.